Thursday, March 9, 2017 There are so many possible endings to this story, but all of them are bad. Everyone around will tell you it was an accident, that the kid was lying. But I know he wasn't. I can see it in his eyes. And I know someone who might have been the shooter. It was early February. I was on patrol in Dorchester. The worst part of the job, the part that I hated. I was bored. I hadn't had a call in more than two hours, and I was bored. And then I heard the gunshot. It was close, but I couldn't tell from where, and I could tell the other cop was worried about it. So I figured someone's gun was jammed, someone was shooting at them, or that the cop was shooting at himself. But then I saw it-- it was a cop shooting his own partner. "Shots fired!" he yelled. "Shots fired!" And the sergeant looked at me, pointed his gun at my head and said, "You go!" Then he went into the building and came back with his gun, his belt and his gear, and told us, "It's not my gun. I'll catch you at roll call." And that's when I realized it was my gun. The one I'd taken from the evidence locker on my last day. I checked the magazine and a bullet was in the chamber. My badge. My sidearm. I was only three weeks out of the academy, and I knew I shouldn't be handling a weapon. I should have told the sergeant I had more training. I should have told him I'd been to the range. But I was afraid he'd shoot me. I was new, and I hadn't been on the streets. And I was thinking, I'm not ready. I should have told him. But what if he was the shooter? He would have known I'd handled the gun, and he would have had time to empty it into me. So I just followed him into the station, which wasn't much of an escape for me, because I was scared. That's what I remembered most about that day. I was scared. And I knew something was wrong. I'd taken that gun away from the evidence locker, because I knew something was wrong. My mind was racing. What would I say? What should I do? And then I got a call that the kid in 82157476af
